LONDON Under the richly decorated ceiling of St. Paul's Cathedral, as parishioners and tourists mingle, a naked blue man surfaces from water and drowns over and over again.

The man is the subject of a video installation called "The Messenger." It was created by artist Bill Viola and is part of a major exhibition of contemporary religious art to be shown at cathedrals around Britain that the Anglican Church hopes will challenge traditional views of Christ and spirituality.

"We sometimes forget that for 1,800 years the Christian story has been the most important single influence in the shaping of art forms in the Western world, whether it is literature or painting or Very Rev. John Moses, the dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, says.

"I happen to believe that if the Church is serious in working with people where they are today then it needs to rediscover a working relationship with artists of all traditions."

Works in the "Presence: Images of Christ for the Third Millennium" show include Jill Sim's "Blue Christ," a bronze statue with a crown of thorns gathered from the Serbian-Kosovan border; a monoprint of Christ coming down from the cross by artist Tracy Emin, who previously outraged critics by presenting her soiled, unmade bed as a masterpiece; and a video work by Mark Wallinger that shows a man riding the escalators in London's Angel subway station.
